

Our Perspective

The 2006 Fraud Review: One giant leap?

The 2006 Fraud Review was welcomed by government and businesses alike as a turning point in the fight against economic crime in the UK. It gave rise to both the Fraud Act 2006, which came into force the following year and introduced the first UK offence of fraud, and to the UK Bribery Act 2010 - arguably the toughest legislation against bribery in the world. Ten years after this review, the Fraud Advisory Panel has asked the question: has the fraud review delivered on its promises?

Objectives of the 2006 Fraud Review

The overarching aim of the Fraud Review was an 'anti-fraud culture throughout society based on deterrence, prevention, detection, investigation, sanctions and redress for victims.' (See The Fraud Review, Ten years on in further reading).

In 2009 the first National Fraud Strategy was published. Later, in 2011, the Fighting Fraud Together national strategy was published. This was the first time that so many government, industry, voluntary and law enforcement bodies - 37 in total - had made a stand together to combat fraud.

Fighting Fraud Together laid out 3 clear strategic objectives towards to the reduction of fraud:

- Awareness - educating people and organisations to protect themselves
- Prevention - through stronger systems and controls
- Enforcement - through more efficient and effective punishment for committing fraud

The good, the bad and the ugly

In addition to the legislation resulting from the Fraud Review the National Fraud Strategic Authority (NFSA) - later the National Fraud Authority (NFA) - was established in 2008; the City of London Police became the national lead force in fraud prevention in 2008 and was given funding for counter-fraud policy; Action Fraud - the world's first single-point fraud reporting system - was established in 2009 along with the National Fraud Intelligence Bureau (responsible for analysing, packaging and redistributing intelligence about fraud); the 1st annual fraud indicator was published in 2010; and the National Crime Agency (NCA) was established in 2013 to lead 'UK law enforcement's fight to cut serious and organised crime' (see www.nationalcrimeagency.gov.uk).

Sadly, weaknesses in the systems meant that it was difficult to report a crime using Action Fraud, and its very existence led local police forces to divulge themselves of responsibility for dealing with such crimes, preferring to refer people directly to Action Fraud. This has been addressed in part with the introduction of 'Action Fraud 2' - an improved version of the system - however, 'The NFIB pushes useful and usable fraud crime information to local forces, but no-one...seems able to persuade local forces to use it properly'.

Developments also took a backward step, cited in part to be due to cuts through austerity, with the abolition of the national fraud indicator in 2014, and perhaps worst of all, the closing of the National Fraud Authority in 2014. Fraud strategy has transferred to the NCA, however it is widely felt that there is still a requirement for a single-purpose strategic body responsible for seeing the big picture in the prevention of fraud.

In addition to this, recent failed attempts to extend the failure-to-prevent section 7 (of the Bribery Act) offence to cover all economic crimes has been seen as a big step backwards and indicative of the piecemeal approach to tackling fraud that led to the national strategic body being closed. More recently, former UK Prime Minister David Cameron announced the government's intention to extend corporate criminal liability to include failure to prevent tax evasion. This new offence was under consultation by HMRC (the UK Revenue) until 10th July 2016. Any responses have been somewhat eclipsed by recent political developments in the UK.

'Extending failure-to-prevent offences to all economic crimes is one of the great anti-fraud challenges of the day and we urge the government to press on with the job.'

Conclusion

Since 2006, the Government has made many positive moves towards fighting economic crime in the UK. However, without a strategic body to gain a big-picture view of where we are now, then monitor and analyse this position, we are in danger of continuously moving two steps forward and three steps back. We are still in need of strategic, consistent, continuous, and measurable action against such crimes, and the investment to make this possible.
